

Travel Assist

Are you protected when traveling abroad?

According to Department of State data, road traffic crashes are the leading cause of injury to U.S. citizens while abroad, and the Centers for Disease Control reports that injuries are the primary reason for U.S. citizens abroad to be transported back to the United States by air medical transport. In many cases private medical insurance may not be accepted outside of the U.S. and Medicare is limited, so carrying Travel AssistSM provides peace of mind. At Nationwide Private Client, we know that our clients keep busy travel schedules, which is why we automatically include Travel Assist protection with each homeowners policy.

How you may be at risk

A man suffered a severe stroke on a cruise line in Mexico and had been transferred to a local hospital. His wife expressed concern about the treatment he was receiving there and felt he needed to go back home to receive special care due to a pre-existing heart condition. Immediately after the first call, EA's medical team contacted the treating clinic in Mexico to obtain a full medical report for the customer. After reviewing the medical information, the EA medical team determined that the customer would likely need long-term rehabilitation and be unable to fly commercially for some time due to the type of surgery required.

Therefore, they recommended he receive urgent care from a specialist in Oregon. EA's medical team immediately began requesting quotes from air ambulance providers via its proprietary air ambulance sourcing tool and was able to secure an air ambulance to transport the customer to the closest medical facility in Oregon. Once the customer was stabilized, he and his wife were transported back to Oregon along with a medical escort. Upon arrival, EA arranged for ground transportation to take the customer to the designated hospital where his bed had been reserved, so he could receive the care he needed. Since

EA determined the medical evacuation was necessary, the transportation costs from Mexico to the hospital in Oregon were covered by the policy. EA's immediate response, constant communication and logistical coordination made a stressful situation less so and allowed the customer to receive treatment near his home with his family and loved ones by his side.
